HOME ALONE

Home Alone (Taken from the L.A. Times)

As a new school year begins, parents may find themselves in a quandary about what to do with their children after school. For working parents, it may mean leaving them home alone.

But when is it proper to leave a child alone? What can a parent do to ensure the child is safe and what are some of the alternatives?

Latchkey children are a cause of concern for many parents, child welfare advocates and law enforcement officials. Some kids left at home may enjoy the independence, while others can feel neglected. Parents often end up worrying or feeling guilty.

Kids end up in latchkey situations for generally three reasons: financial difficulties that cause a previously non-working parent to take a job; death of a grandparent or other caregiver who watched the child after school; or divorce.

The cost of a babysitter or after-school enrichment program may be prohibitive, forcing children to be unsupervised until mom or dad comes home. Some local schools or parks offer after-school programs. And for those who do stay home alone, two local hotlines are staffed by trained volunteers ready to listen to kids' concerns or to simply help with homework. When is it okay to leave a child home alone? There is no magic number for determining how old children must be before they can be left on their own. State law doesn't set an age, however, minors must not be placed in a situation where they are likely to suffer bodily harm, nor can their basic needs be neglected. Experts say parents must consider several factors, including the child's maturity level, time of day he is alone and whether he has to watch over other children. When a parent decides to leave a child alone, it is a good idea to begin slowly, staying away for 15 minutes at a time and gradually lengthening the duration to see the child fares.

Who's at home? 50,000, or 12%, of California's 4.2 million, children 5 to 14, are left home alone for some time during the day -- California Department of Education.

For children 5 to 12, almost 15% are unsupervised when they return home from school --Urban Institute, a Washington, DC, nonpartisan think tank.

Nationwide, between 5 million and 12 million children ages 5 to 13 are left at home alone for part of every day -- National Crime Prevention Council Working Moms.

Dangers of Being Alone - Latchkey children are about three times more likely than those supervised by adults to be involved in accidents, engage in delinquent behavior or be victimized -- National Crime Prevention Council Safety Tips for Kids.

Always walk home with a friend on a safe, well-traveled route. If possible, walk against traffic so you can see a car stopped nearby. Don't accept rides from strangers. Use an answering machine to screen phone calls. If you don't have an answering machine, say the parent is unavailable and offer to take a message. Don't say you're alone or give out any information. Keep all doors and windows locked. Do not open the door to anyone, unless pre-approved a parent. If someone is delivering a package, it can be left outside. Go to a neighbor's house if a door is open or the house is in unusual disarray when you arrive home. Don't let people know you will be home alone or display your house key on a chain. Avoid watching or reading scary stories that might trigger your imagination and make you feel frightened. Call a parent or trusted neighbor if you have questions or are concerned about anything.

Suggestions for parents:. Teach children when and how call 911. Explain that they must dial 9-1-1; some children may get confused and look for an 11 on the phone. Have them practice with the phone disconnected. Don't put your child's name on their clothing or backpack; an abductor may be able to gain a child's trust if they use his name. Adopt a family code word and change it occasionally. Teach children to not go with someone unless they know the code word. Keep emergency numbers by the phone. Have a first-aid kit and money in the house in case emergencies. Leave a loving note for your children to see when they get home. Have an alternative plan in place should your child become sick or injured.
